Craig Alan

A California native, Craig Alan displayed an aptitude for creativity and visual arts from a young age. He fostered his abilities through both formal and informal educational channels, complementing his natural talent with technical knowledge. Weekends spent drawing portraits in New Orleans helped him refine his skills and support his education. His formal training in studio art, along with theater, equipped him with a broad skill set that influences his diverse works. Today, Craig has established himself as a well-known portraiture artist. Craig's series were inspired by a moment when he observed a crowd from a balcony and saw shapes forming among the people. This led to his exploration of small figures in figurative, abstract, and conceptual forms.

His art, ranging from abstract expressionism to graphic realism, is displayed in over 15 U.S. galleries and abroad. A Populus portrait of Senator Harry Reid was even presented at the U.S. Capitol. Craig's works continue to inspire collectors and artists alike, with his creative vision rooted in a balance of technique and spontaneous expression.
